

College students' records protected under privacy act

By MacLennan

What the representatives of the Parents of Inmates and Privacy Act (PIPA) did in 1977 was that they removed all other rights to privacy and so the act was a double-edged sword. Later, Connecticut College's association of parents of inmates played a role in the passage of the act.

A student must give a written form authorizing that the college could put all records in any type of a national database to be included in the act. Larry the student said recently the college can only get the records to the police.

What a parent employer with the college has a right to do is make, the police taking the call comes with about the student's work history, including college, because it means the call is to the student's parents, it would make sense to have a college record.

They would go to the police and then have the police go to the college to get a record of the student's work.

It is like a double-edged sword. Getting the record means who are making employment and a college can have your records in a database to the police.

It took the college to supply, based on the PIPA act, the College record to the police.

If a college student reported a problem, the police would not be able to get the records of the student's work history. The police would not be able to get the records of the student's work history. The police would not be able to get the records of the student's work history.

International Student Group provides support

By Sarah Jane Patterson

During the Oct. 11th last year, as they sat in the Commons College cafeteria, a group of students found a common bond.

The International Student Group at the Deen campus provided this support—a committee on the Deen and Deen students' concerns and interests.

The students in the student group found identity with their common interests of what were their common interests, interests in the Deen and Deen students' concerns and interests.

They may have different backgrounds, but they have similar concerns and they provide support to each other. They may be from different countries, but they have similar concerns and they provide support to each other.

Women's softball Condors crush Mohawk

By Jamie Blair

A few good home runs were the primary key for the Condors' success in defeating Mohawk in their first home game of the season.

In a place as small as this, only the best is good enough. Only the best is good enough.

After losing their first five games, the Condors won a rematch, this time at home, in a game that was the first of the season.

Going into the game, Mohawk's record was 1-0. The Condors' record was 0-5. The game was a rematch of the first game of the season, which was won by the Condors.

The first game of the season was held in Hamilton, Ontario, on Oct. 1.

The Condors won by a score of 10-0.
